WOMEN IN ENGLISH PHILANTHROPY 1790-1830*

Students of institutional charity must sometimes share Walter Bagehot's melancholy doubt "whether the benevolence of mankind does most harm or good";[2] but they do not dispute that philanthropists were ubiquitous in England by the middle decades of the nineteenth century. Sir James Stephen called the period the age of charitable societies. "For the cure of every sorrow [...] there are patrons, vice-presidents, and secretaries. For the diffusion of every blessing [...] there is a committee."[3] Many issues raised by the expansion of philanthropy have been treated with considerable insight. But at least one question has largely escaped the historian: the role of charitable women among the "Fathers of the Victorians".

Generations of scholars have accepted women as charitable in their habits, and now and then they have raised the exceptional female philanthropist to the level of biography. But they have not been much interested in the origins or scope of women's participation in organized charity, and they have little idea of the impact of social forces upon female generosity.[3] This study tackles the problem on a numerical basis, and is confined to the years 1790-1830, decades in which a significant amount of published data is available from charitable societies. After establishing the proportion of women involved in these societies
